San Andreas is absolutely huge, with each city feeling uniquely different and filled to the brim with things to check out, and by throwing in some gameplay elements that are quite similar to the Sims, there's less of an emphasis on actually pushing through the game.

Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas, is many ways is two games in itself. There's Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas, the actual game, that's complete with missions, side missions, and everything in between.

By giving you a huge, sprawling environment to cause havoc in, Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas is a game that's entertaining to just explore, or slowly destroy if that's more your thing.

By and large, the missions have been improved upon, and there are some definite "ohh crap, that was awesome!" moments laden throughout the game. Then there's Grand Theft Auto: San Andreas that you, the gamer, are free to interpret. Some of the textures don't look too hot and there are a few prominent visual bugs, but just about everything else has taken a step up from Vice City. San Andreas is basically your virtual playground, filled with fast cars and deadly guns, and it's up to you to decide how you want to spend your time in San Andreas.
